JACKSON, MICH.

LOCATED in the southern portion of the great State of Michigan, on the direct line of railroad from Detroit to Chicago, Jackson is a particularly beautiful and advancing city. Her broad, smooth and well-paved streets lined with hospitable shade trees and adorned with fine residences and public buildings give the present day visitor to Jackson a sensation of greatest pleasure.

Here is a strong, stable commercial center with banking institutions and well equipped stores covering every department of trade, excellent hotels, churches, schools, libraries and all the other elements which are the necessary parts of a staunch and prosperous American city.

Jackson's excellent railroad facilities and favorable geographical position give her special advantages from a point of view of industry. She has many large manufacturing institutions, prominent among them being her factories for producing corsets, corset steels, carriages and farming tools, all of which have a world-wide reputation.

The city is supplied with the very best of artesian well water and thus escapes the great disadvantage of the typhoid epidemics which have become so prevalent in cities dependent upon river and lake water. The city is well equipped in the matter of electric street car lines, electric lights and artificial gas.

The city was first founded in 1829 and called Jacksonburg, in honor of General Andrew Jackson. Some years later the name was changed by the post office department to Jacksonapolis and in 1883 became finally known as Jackson.

It was here that the National Republican party was formed and on July 6, 1854, a meeting was held in beautiful Oak Grove and was attended by between 3,000 and 4,000 people.
